The cytoplasmic tail of the thrombin receptor mediates binding of the thrombin cleavage products, thrombin-alpha'- and gamma-carboxyglutamic acid domain. The cytoplasmic tails of G-protein-coupled receptors are often short, as compared to membrane spanning regions, and contain several amino acids of sequence similarity. Such sequences may be used as a 'molecular docking site' for a series of ligands which may in turn stimulate the receptor. The thrombin receptor is a member of the G-protein-coupled receptor family and binds the thrombin cleavage products, thrombin-alpha'- and gamma-carboxyglutamic acid domain (PGG). Recently, Tachyplesin I, a short peptide from the hemocytes of the horseshoe crab, Limulus polyphemus, was shown to bind the N-terminal 30 amino acids of the G-protein coupled thrombin receptor and stimulate the receptor (Foster, P.B., Peters, A.B., and Petryszkiewicz, M.J. (1991) Biochem. Biophys. Res. Commun. 180, 1449-1456). We report that synthetic peptides containing similar sequences from the tail region of the thrombin receptor also bind the thrombin cleavage products and stimulate the thrombin receptor. The best correlation with G-protein-coupled receptor stimulation was obtained with a peptide with sequence NH₂-Glu-Ala-Leu-Phe-Tyr-Val-Glu-G
