What is new in this release: What is new in version 1.0.0: Performance improvements. Building or construction site safety is an important issue for workers, managers and supervisory personnel during the construction of new buildings or during the remodeling of existing structures. Many construction sites suffer from low lighting, and therefore the need for portable lighting and fall protection devices at the construction site. While each site may have its own unique hazards, many sites have certain hazards that are similar to those at other sites. The issue of construction site safety is complicated because of the diversity of construction sites, the complexity of the many different hazards that can be present at a construction site, and the need for the application of fall protection systems when working from elevated structures. Current systems for fall protection devices utilize complex and expensive means of holding the fall protection device in place, such as putting the safety line around the worker, putting the safety line through a hole in the worker's protective clothing, or a combination of the two. However, the current methods of fall protection are not always feasible, such as when the distance between the worker and the location of the fall protection device is too great or when the worker is wearing heavy clothing which makes it difficult to manipulate the device with one's fingers. Furthermore, current systems for fall protection devices can be expensive and complicated to maintain. Some systems are intended for temporary use on a construction site. However, the current method of protecting a worker with the use of fall protection systems can be time-consuming, cumbersome, require multiple workers, and can not be used in a cost-effective manner. Furthermore, current systems for fall protection devices have limited portability and can not easily or efficiently be adapted for on-site use. Current systems may
